I should have written this yesterday but im just too tired. Regarding backrooms, loved everything except the last conversation between Mary and clark, I mean the last conversation just doesn't make any sense. Whenever I read or watch a family drama, I like to reverse the genders, so now let's say clark is a female and pays for everything, house, college fees, and others, and then her husband kicks her out of the house because she's drunk and broke some glass one day. Now, do Mary's words make any sense? So clark can't blame anyone but herself? but she paid for everything? Like I just don't understand. If she paid for everything and is still paying, and the guy isn't contributing financially or at least acknowledging and appreciating her efforts, why is she expected to blame only herself?

I do feel a bit frustrated when I left because I don't think I'm doing anything, and only allowed to do few things.
